Evidence is presented that a hyperactivity of UDP-glucuronosyltransferase (UGT) 1A8 in rat liver microsomes is responsible for the glucuronidation of acetaminophen (AA) in vivo. High rates of glucuronidation of phenacetin and benzyl alcohol were observed, and they corresponded with the production of over 80% of the parent compound in microsomal incubations containing acetaminophen. AA and acetaminophen glucuronide (AA-G), but not sulfate or carboxylic acid, were also metabolized to a greater extent than expected from the relatively high glucuronidation rates. Furthermore, hyperactivity was observed in a liver-specific UGT subfamily 1A isoform, 1A8, which expresses considerable levels of the unique peptide sequence characteristic of the UGT1A subfamily 1A enzymes. In contrast to the microsomal incubations, microsomal preparations with high glucuronidation rates formed AA-G and sulfate but not acetaminophen. Thus, the AA-G level in the liver was decreased by more than 50% by injection of monoclonal antibody (MoAb) 9D3 against 1A8 isoform. The hyperactivity was also observed in recombinant UGT1A8. However, the activities were not significantly different in microsomes from 1A8 (+/+) and 1A8 (+/-) rats. The Km values for conjugated fatty acids were similar in microsomes from 1A8 (+/+) and 1A8 (+/-) rats, but the Vmax in 1A8 (+/+) rat liver microsomes was 2.0-fold higher than that in 1A8 (+/-) rat liver microsomes. These results suggest that the apparent higher rate of gluc f678ea9f9e
